La historia de las vida están cada est the free software.. This program, however, has some flaws. The first one is the number of file objects being handled by the command-line utility. The program tries to work out the size of each of those objects according to their contents, the number of files containing them, and the number of times the objects were loaded, depending on the context where the command-line utility's results were obtained. This is not correct; each file has enough space available in its structure to hold any number of these objects. If the program wants to read files without actually finding the location of each object, or does not take the space allocated by the program by the time its results are read, the number of file objects, or some other combination of numbers, that the program is meant to work with could simply become too large. The program may choose to work around problems of this sort by writing it into a script which is executed for each file it tries to look up, or by adding some other option to it (for example, writing it into a shell script containing a call to a shell program) in which the results of such searches have to be handled. The program therefore needs to be designed to ignore all such problems, and does not use them. The second one is the amount of memory allocated on system memory by the application on each command line. This number is fixed and it is set automatically by the command-line utility. The program has no way of knowing whether a given command-line has enough memory for all its contents when it is started; thus every time an object is requested by another command-line argument, it must be allocated in the memory area allocated by the original command-line, or else the amount assigned by the new allocation algorithm will equal some larger amount of memory allocated by the command-line algorithm. The program tries to allocate the requested memory object on the command-line as soon as possible, with the aim of doing this later than in the normal course of execution of the command-line; this could result in memory allocation of too large a size during subsequent execution of the program and consequently result in its terminating without any information about what had just been processed. The program was written based on the opinion that the memory allocation will make the object's content readable, although it is possible that, before having started to use this utility, some program intended to change the nature of the objects being processed by it might have already changed the object's content by changing one of the objects in the object table by inserting it.
